IF AT FIRST YOU DON'T SUCCEED...

Submitted by Village of Richfield Springs Historian Harriett Geywits

He was born in Indiana, named for his mother's cousin, future President of the United States James Buchanan. His father moved them from one town to the next, trying to eke out a living and failing each time. Missouri is where he grew up, the family settling there after a horrendous trip to St. Louis on a steamboat. When approaching the wharves, a chimney flue collapsed causing a fire that killed eight people. While his family escaped, they had nothing but the clothes on their backs. The business ventures of his father failed once again - his father abandoning his family.

The early life of James Buchanan Eads (1820-1887) did not have a happy beginning. At the age of thirteen, he left school to take up work to help support his two sisters and mother, who ran a boarding house. He sold apples on the streets of St. Louis and ran errands for the Williams & Duhring dry-good store, run by Barrett Williams. This was where his life began to change.

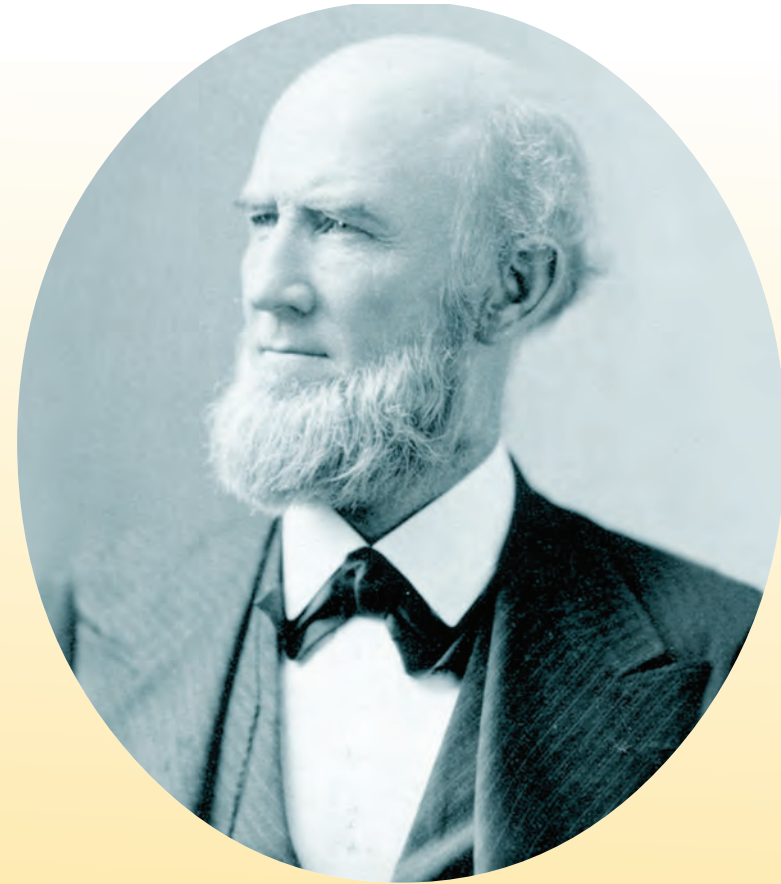

Because Williams realized how clever this young man was, he allowed him to spend time in his library, located above the store. Eads read books on physical science, mechanics, machinery and civil engineering. This served as his formal education.

Eads had his first important designing idea in 1842 at the age of twenty-two when he was working as a clerk on a steamboat called the Knickerbocker. Carrying a cargo of lead, the boat hit a snag that ripped open the bottom and caused the boat to sink. This wasn't an unusual happening. Because of the strong currents in the Mississippi river, salvaging wrecks had been nearly impossible. The river was littered with sunken boats and cargo.

The idea came to Eads to design a vessel for raising the remains of these sunken ships and a diving bell to use in finding their remains. He had no previous experience and certainly no capital, but he took his designs to Case and Nelson, two boatbuilders. They were impressed with Eads and his design and built his boat. The three men were now in the salvage business.

Because Eads did much of the dangerous diving himself, he developed a detailed knowledge of the Mississippi and had the ability to navigate the most treacherous parts with his snag boats and salvage craft. He was given the honorary courtesy title of 'Captain' by the other rivermen, a title he was known by throughout the rest of his life.

All was not well, however. In 1842, Eads fell in love with Martha Dillon, a woman related to him by marriage. Martha's father was a prominent St. Louis businessman and did not approve of the couple, wanting her to marry someone with money and influence. Despite this, in 1845, the couple married without her father's consent. She lived with Eads' family in Iowa while he stayed in St. Louis to set up his next enterprise - a glass works. This business failed and he went back to working in salvage to pay off his debts. Unfortunately, Martha died in 1852 of cholera, never knowing that her husband would eventually have a successful life.

Eads married Eunice Hagerman in 1861. He was retired but the outbreak of the Civil War forced him back to work. He was summoned to Washington and given the assignment of building seven, iron-plated gunboats to be used by Union forces to conduct their Western campaign - essential to gaining the control of the Mississippi and its tributaries. He built the boats and even adapted one of his salvage boats into a war vessel. He felt that unless the waterway was kept open, the fortunes of the whole Midwest were sunk.

St. Louis was considered the gateway to the West and Eads felt there was a need for a bridge that combined road and railway service to the Mississippi from St. Louis, Missouri to East St. Louis, Illinois. This would not be a conventional bridge but an arched one to be built of steel. It took seven years to complete, but Eads proved to his opponents that it could be done. The bridge still stands and is in use.

Another of Eads designs solved a serious problem at the mouth of the Mississippi where the silt buildups in its outlets stranded ships and made the river unnavigable at times. He successfully eliminated the sandbars by building wooden jetties. This success added to Eads fame.

In 1885, toward the end of his life, we find that Captain James B. Eads, builder of these jetties, visiting at the Spring House in Richfield Springs with his wife and step-daughter. We don't know if he was here for a vacation or to take the baths for health reasons.

On March 8, 1887, at the age of sixty-six, James Eads collapsed and died while on vacation in the Bahamas. A man of vision, even as a youth, he seemed to realize that the future prosperity of America depended on building our infrastructure based on new technology. A man who, in spite of setbacks, was determined to succeed.
