Can All You Can

*Submitted by Village of Richfield Springs
Historian Harriett Geywits*

It's the time of year to get prepared for those winter winds and one of the most important ways to be sure that you will be able to withstand anything 'old man winter' throws at you, is to have a good food supply on hand. This is much more easily done now than it was, say in the 1900s, when produce from your garden, fruit from your trees and meat grown on the farm had to be smoked, salted, fermented, packed in the root cellar, or hung from the rafters to dry. It was a matter of pride as well as a necessity to have a full larder.

The art of 'putting up' or processing food at home is nothing new. Ceramic and dark glass containers had been used for storage for thousands of years, mainly for non-perishable foods or with preservatives such as salt, sugar, vinegar or alcohol.

French chef and confectioner Nicholas Appert (1749-1841) began experimenting with ways of preservation in the late 1700s. He thought that the presence of air in canning led to spoilage and was encouraged in his experiments by Napoleon and the French government who, in 1795, offered a prize of 12,000 francs to anyone who could devise an effective way to feed the troops. It wasn't until fifteen years later that Appert's efforts were recognized and he was considered for the prize. By then, he had realized that not only air could cause spoilage but heat was also necessary to keep canned goods safe. His system involved putting food inside glass jars that were then corked and sealed off with wax. The jars were then wrapped in canvas and boiled. Appert knew the system worked, but he didn't know why! For his efforts, he was later to become known as 'The Father of Food Science'. He was not a good businessman however, and died a pauper.

In the United States, John Landis Mason, a tinsmith from New Jersey, began searching in the 1850s for an improved process for home canning. In 1858, Mason patented a threaded screw top jar intended to be air and water tight. He had created a process of cutting threads into the lip of the glass jar with a corresponding thread inside the zinc lid with a rubber ring inside. The earliest Mason jars were made from transparent aqua glass, often referred to as Crowley Town jars, believed to be first produced in that village in New Jersey. The glass was made with thicker walls than other glass jars so it would withstand heat and was transparent so the contents could be easily seen. The original light color helped to block some light rays to slow spoilage. Any bubbles that might appear in the glass were due to trapped air and were called 'seeds'.

Mason, however, neglected to patent the entire jar and lid which included the rubber ring on the underside of the metal lid which was critical in keeping an airtight seal. It wasn't until 1868 that he tried to patent the lid itself and by then others had built up their manufacturing of canning supplies and he couldn't regain control of his invention. He died in 1902, allegedly penniless.

The Mason name became a generic trademark for this style of glass canning jars, the name being included on many of the other manufacturer's brands.

The Ball brothers, Edmund, Frank, George, Lucius and William, bought a small Wooden Jacket Can Company in Buffalo, NY in 1880. The company produced wood jacketed tin containers for storing things like kerosene. They soon began to produce tin cans and glass jars, setting shop in Indiana where natural gas fields provided fuel for glass blowing. The Ball brand was to become the largest producer of mason jars in America.

In the mid-1900s, it was common to find rural homes with a 'summer kitchen' where all of the canning and preserving of goods took place, keeping the main house cool. There was more involved in the process of canning than the jars themselves. Water bath, or hot water canning, was used for high acid foods and the pressure canner for low acid foods. All jars had to be checked for any nicks or cracks and thoroughly washed. Hot jars were filled with hot ingredients and tops applied before placing in the canner. Pressure canners, used for low acid foods, weren't popular in the United States until after 1905. Although they appeared in France in 1679 (known as a Digester) it wasn't until the National Presto Industries, founded in Wisconsin, began to produce home models of cast aluminum, that the pressure canners began to be more widely used. These could reach high heats more quickly, reducing cooking time.

Home canning reached its peak in 1943 during World War II when Victory Gardens were encouraged to help the war effort. They were promoted by the government as a symbol of patriotism and a way for families to supplement rationed supplies.

There have been hundreds of manufacturers of canning jars and tops through the years in a variety of sizes and colors - even a rare upside down Ball jar that was produced between 1900 and 1910, designed to rest on its lid. While the need for preserving food using home canning has lessened with the invention of refrigeration and freezing and products being more easily obtained, the process has had a revival in the 21st century with raised interests in environmental and economic issues.

The early canning jars are now collector's items and are still in use, maybe not for canning purposes, but for storage of dry items, decoration and objects that remind us of days past.

For those who still use the canning method to preserve their food, don't forget to honor National Mason Jar Day, observed on November 30th!
